NE—I began work with the intention of confining the Prakrit readings within the limits of the orthodox rules for creating Prakrit from the Sanskrit. But it soon became evident that a large number of Prakrit forms which did not conform to prose rules were nevertheless consistently uniform throughout the texts in which they appeared. While this circumstance pointed out the existence of various schools of Prakrit scholarship, another large number of the irregular forms had plausible but by no means absolutely erroneous shapes which showed independence of all rules and raised the question whether each scholar in transcribing his copy did not feel himself at liberty to treat his Prakrit according to his own personal liking. Assuming this to be so, I have conceded to such readings the right to a place, though but a secondary one, amongst the admissible variations. F.
